

from Paris; that all along the road, as far as Avignon, hi* h;u; heard nothing but regret for the Kmpt'ror.s absence; that IUH name was constantly echoed from mouth to mouth; and that, when once fairly through I'rove we, In* would find the whole population ready to rally round him. The man added that his laced livery had frequently rendered him tin* object of odium and insult on the road. Thin was the testimony of one of the common class of society: it wan very gratifying to the, Emperor, as it entirely corresponded with hi.s expectations. The Prince of Monaco himself, on being presented to the Emperor, was less explicit. Napoleon refrained from cfutw~ tioning him on political matters. The conversation therefore assumed a more lively character^ ami turned altogether ou the ladies of the former Imperial Court, eoueeraiig whom the Emperor was very particular in hi.s inquiries.

As soon as the moon hail risen, which wan about, out* or two in the morning of the 2d, the bivouacs were broken up, and Napoleon gave, orders for proceeding tt» Grassc. There ha expected to find a road which he hat! planned during the Empire, but in this he WUH disappointed, the Boiii'tams having given up all such expensive works through want of money. Bonaparte was therefore obliged to pass tlmngh narrow defiles filled with snow, and left behind him in the hands of the municipality his carriage and two pieces of cannon, which had been brought ashore. This was termed u rupture in tlw bulletins of the day. The municipality of CtRium* WUH Htrongly in favor of the Royalist cause, but the sudden u|»| H'ara,n<*f< of the Emperor afforded but little time for hesitation, and they came to tender their suhmiatdcm to him. Having j»;iHHi*d through the town he halted on a little height «orn« way beyond it, where he breakfasted. H« mmn HttrtYmnded by the whole population of the place; and he heard the name nen- timents and the same prayers as twfor he tpiitted Franre. A multitude of petitions had already bi*«ii drawn np, and went presented to him, just as though he had cuttieu* fr«ia PartH and was making a tour through the departmental. One complained that his pension had not been paid, another that hii

of the Legion of Honor had been taken from him.
Home of tlt